Positive psychology leadership coaching

Good morning. Our article looks at a simple but important question: can coaching help strong technical managers become better leaders of people? Frans Cilliers studied this inside a South African financial organisation. The coaching helped managers understand themselves more clearly. However, relating to other people remained difficult. That difference between knowing yourself and leading others is the main thread of our presentation.

Frans Cilliers

Before we discuss the study, let me briefly introduce the author. Frans Cilliers worked in industrial and organisational psychology at the University of South Africa. He was also a practising psychologist and leadership coach. In this project he was both the coach and the researcher. That gave him close access to the participants, although it also created a possible source of bias that we will discuss later.

How the study emerged

This study appeared at an interesting time. Positive psychology became influential after 2000, and organisations soon started using its ideas in coaching. Practice was growing faster than the research evidence. In 2010, a financial organisation asked Cilliers to work with managers who performed well on technical tasks but struggled with people. He submitted the study in 2010, and the journal published it in 2011.

Why Cilliers published the study

Cilliers published the study because the organisation had a genuine leadership problem. These managers understood targets, systems and control, but many found listening and relationship building difficult. He also found a gap in earlier research. Previous studies examined separate coaching outcomes, while this programme brought several positive psychology ideas together. He therefore wanted to understand how the managers actually experienced the coaching.
