Positive psychology in leadership

The article uses positive psychology in a broader sense than simply feeling happy. It focuses on strengths, meaning, responsibility and healthy functioning. In leadership terms, the programme wanted managers to understand themselves, develop motivation from within and build better relationships. The final point is especially important because the organisation needed managers who could work effectively with people, not only deliver financial results.

The field already contained a warning

The existing research already showed both promise and risk. Coaching could improve engagement, confidence and effectiveness. At the same time, researchers warned that coaching practice was moving faster than the evidence. A focus on positivity could also make people avoid uncomfortable emotions. This warning matters because the participants improved in self-awareness, but their difficult relationship habits did not disappear automatically.

Five constructs shaped the coaching

Cilliers organised the coaching around five ideas. Work engagement concerns energy and involvement. Learned resourcefulness means managing thoughts and emotions under pressure. Sense of coherence concerns whether challenges feel understandable and manageable. Self-actualisation focuses on growth and authenticity. Internal locus of control means believing that our own choices influence outcomes. These ideas formed the framework for interpreting the participants' development.

The conceptual leadership profile

Together, these ideas produce the leadership profile shown here. A leader should engage with the role, understand the difference between management and leadership, recognise emotional demands and act with internal confidence. The final step is helping other people grow. That was the hardest part for these managers. They improved personally, but they still struggled to turn that improvement into better relationships. I will now hand over to Usman.
