Findings Part Two and Discussion

Use this as a speaking guide, not a script to memorise. Keep the meaning, but say it in your own natural voice.

Emotional self-awareness

The fourth theme is emotional self-awareness. Early in the programme, many participants relied on logic and avoided discussing feelings. As the sessions continued, they became better at recognising emotions such as fear, frustration and anger. This helped them understand their own reactions. However, recognising your own emotions is only the first step. Responding appropriately to another person's emotions requires a different interpersonal skill.

Self-authorisation

The fifth theme is self-authorisation. At first, some participants blamed the organisation, senior management or colleagues when leadership became difficult. Coaching helped them recognise their own choices and take more responsibility for their responses. They began relying less on formal authority and more on personal judgment. This strengthened their confidence, but confidence by itself did not guarantee better relationships.

The interpersonal gap remained

The final theme is the most important limitation. Meetings still focused heavily on instructions, decisions and control. Participants became more aware of emotional signals, but they often did not know how to respond. Some felt anxious when colleagues gave honest feedback. The coaching therefore improved awareness more than interpersonal skill. The managers could notice more, but they could not always use that understanding to help others grow.

How the findings connect with theory

These findings connect back to the original framework. Engagement improved as participants gave more energy to people issues. Leadership also became easier to understand, and internal control supported personal responsibility. Emotional awareness developed mainly within the individual. The weaker area was active listening and responding to other people's needs. The framework therefore helps explain both the improvement and the gap that remained.
